

Question: Why did some people have little or no patience when the ferry boat was in danger of sinking?

Question 2: If there are too many buyers of fish in the market, what is likely to happen?

Ferry Boat Assignment Answer

Giving answer to the first question, people usually lose patience in the time of danger. When they have a risk of life, then they get afraid much. Therefore they could not apply their discretion. It happens in most of the people's case. But as a matter of fact we ought to keep our patient each time. Losing patience dos not bring anything but loss. But due to people's emotional faculty, they have little or no patience in the time of danger.

Now let us talk about the second question. The answer of the second question is a purely matter of common sense. When the consumer's number gets higher than the number of products, the price becomes higher than expected range. Sellers of fish will make the price elevated by seeing a large number of buyers. |
